Dear People Whom God Loves,

Struggling with Sin

The reading from the Book of Genesis 3:9-15, 20 struggles with the problem of evil. How can there be an all good God when there is evil and sin? Today let's focus on the notion of original sin, which is part of the bigger picture of evil. We'll talk evil another time.

The apostle Paul drew his idea about original sin from the Book of Genesis. Saint Augustine carried this further by adding sexual content to it from his own personal bad experiences.

So we have this doctrine of original sin, which says there is something wrong with us. We're drawn to sin. We're drawn to destruction. There are all kinds of things that just don't work right. This seems to point to a larger truth.

Now the authors of the Book of Genesis told a story to try to make some sense of this truth. How can we have a God who is all good when there is so much sin in the world? How does that fit together? All the authors of Genesis could do was use the knowledge that they had. Of course their understanding of the world was very different from ours. They thought that the world as we know it was made by God. God made the mountains, the rivers and the oceans just as they are. This reality is what the authors of Genesis knew and what they had to draw from. They did not realize that long before their own time, the entire terrain of the world was totally different. As they saw it, God made everything just as we see it today. God made the dogs and cats and cows and trees. God made them just as they are today. He plunked all of these things down into this world.

Of course, a world made by an all perfect God had to be perfect and wonderful, so it was called paradise, the Garden of Eden. Then God made human beings and put them into this beautiful garden. Everything was harmonious. Everything was wonderful. Everything was magnificent. And then they sinned. And because they sinned, this gets passed down to all of us. So we have what we have today—all of these terrible propensities to do wrong, to hurt each other and so on.

That is the story the authors of Genesis told, because they had to tell it out of their own perspective. But the story points to a larger truth. Remember, the stories are not the truth; they point to a truth that is deeper. The problem today is that the story of Genesis doesn't work very well anymore, because we know from science that this is not the way things happened. So we need a different kind of story to point to the very same truth that this original story was pointing to.

How do we account for sin? It didn't start with people. All of the behaviors that we call sins are found in the animals. Aggression, exploitation, deceit, theft, warfare and cannibalism can all be found in the animal kingdom—even pride. And yet we think that all this came from us. Chimpanzees do things to save face. That's pride. In other words, all of the impulses toward these kinds of behavior, which we now call sin when they are done by people, existed long before there were any people on the earth. All the animals came from a different branch of the tree than human beings, so sin precedes us. In fact, these propensities we call sin all go back to the beginning of life on our planet. As things developed and evolved, the animals did all of these awful, terrible things, but we don't call it sin because there is no moral responsibility in animals. They were just doing what they do.

Then human beings arrived on the scene. They did not arrive into paradise. They arrived into this mess with all of these propensities we call sin. As the mind grew, human beings began to develop some sense of responsibility and morality. The doing of these behaviors became sin, because people did them knowing they were evil. When animals do the same wrong behavior as we do, we don't call it sin, because there is no moral responsibility. But to the degree that we do these behaviors freely and know what we are doing, we give them the name sin.

So this propensity toward evil did not start with human beings, but we do continue it. We've got all of these things inside of us and we make choices, sometimes very knowingly and deliberately, that are destructive and harmful, just increasing the mess.

More to come.

Smile, God loves you,
Father Clay
